There once was a dog named Kinley,
who could smell smells around the world.
Her nose was pink, her hair was fuzzy,
her tail was curlicue-curved.

She could smell the fresh bread
that was baking in France, and Flamencos in Spain
who were doing a dance.

In England, she smelled
lots of fresh-brewing tea, and spaghetti in heaps
all throughout Italy.

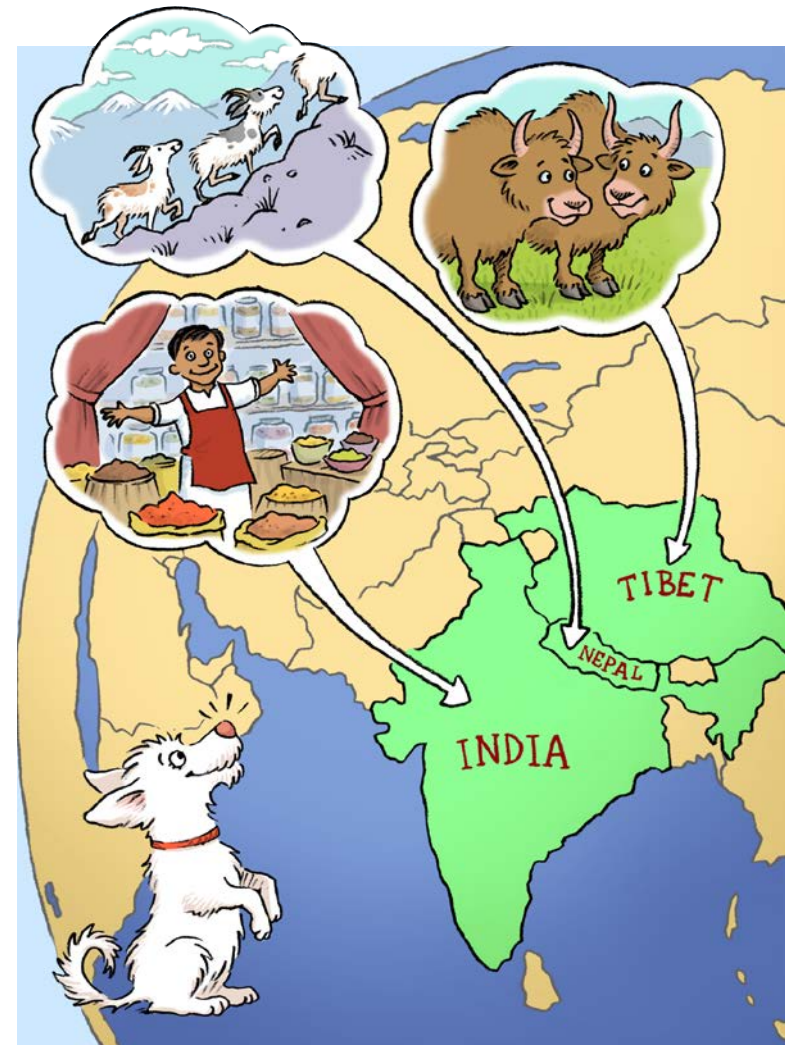

In Scotland, strange monsters
that hid in the lochs,
and in Ireland, sheep
that munched green grass in flocks.

Throughout all of Russia were meat and potatoes.

In Israel, the reddest
and ripest tomatoes.

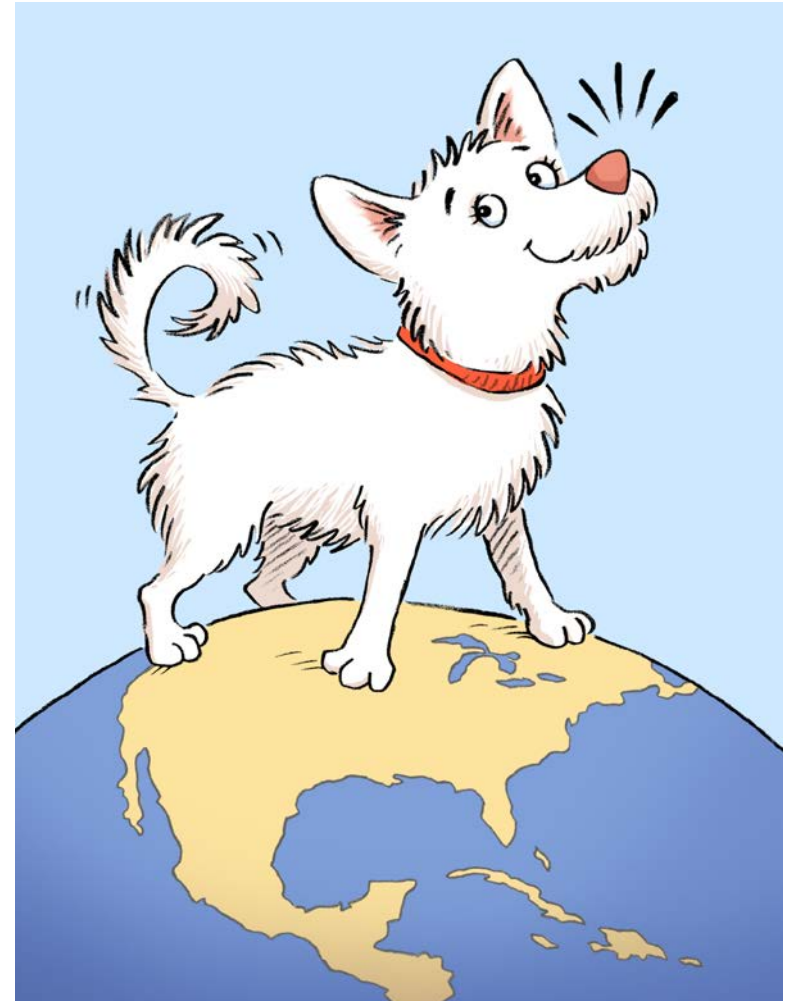

In India, spices.

In Tibet, furry yaks.

In Nepal, she smelled goats that climbed mountains in packs.

In Kenya, fierce lions.
 In Egypt were camels.
 The whole world smelled
 of some strange-smelling mammals!

One thing Kinley knew:
 Every smell she could smell,
 no matter what country
 in which that smell dwelled,

Each smell she could tell,
from wherever she stood,
was equally different
and equally good.

Except the best smell—
Kinley needs no reminder—
the smell of her food
in the bowl right behind her!
